Robert Mueller's nearly two-year-long investigation concluded without finding adequate evidence to show that officials with Donald Trump's presidential 2016 campaign aided Russian attempts to interfere with the election.

"The investigation did not establish that members of the Trump Campaign conspired or coordinated with the Russian government in its election interference activities," the special counsel wrote in his findings, which Attorney General William Barr released Sunday in four-page summary form.

Mueller's long-awaited findings also do not take a clear position on whether Trump obstructed justice.

"For each of the relevant actions investigated, the report sets out evidence on both sides of the question and leave unresolved what the special counsel views as 'difficult issues' of law and fact concerning whether the President's actions and intent could be viewed as obstruction," Barr wrote in a letter to the key House and Senate

Mueller's long-awaited findings also do not take a clear position on whether Trump obstructed justice.

"For each of the relevant actions investigated, the report sets out evidence on both sides of the question and leave unresolved what the special counsel views as 'difficult issues' of law and fact concerning whether the President's actions and intent could be viewed as obstruction," Barr wrote in a letter to the key House and Senate. More...