

Dr. Garth Nicholson, microbiologist and director of the Institute for Molecular Medicine, says yes.

The government doesn't require vaccine makers to test for certain biological contaminants and pharmaceutical companies certainly don't volunteer.

Because the vast majority of physicians are unaware of this common source of chronic illness they don't test for it or have protocols to treat it. I imagine most doctors, after taking their fees, tell patients suffering from these illnesses that it's "all in their heads."
