

Thousands of Parents Blame Vaccines, and Are Taking on the Medical Establishment.

"According to my friends who've attended medical school, much of their time is spent learning the pharmacokinetics of prescription drugs

," Jane Johnson, director of the Autism Research Institute's Defeat Autism Now! project and co-author, with Dr. Bryan Jepson, of Changing the Course of Autism, explained to AlterNet via email. "This is unique to the United States; in other countries, it's still understood that nutrition plays a vital role in health. But parents can be part of this problem: It's much easier to simply give a pill and call it a day. I have to admit I'd prefer that myself."
