

Trump is set to debate his Democratic opponent, Hillary Clinton, on Sept. 26. When it happens, Goodall told The Atlantic she'll be thinking of "Mike," a chimpanzee she studied that displayed dominance by kicking kerosene cans, creating a racket that sent would-be challengers fleeing.

Unsurprisingly, Trump has already boasted that he will come out on top, telling The New York Times "I know how to handle Hillary."

Whether his strategy includes childish tidbits has yet to be seen. Tony Schwartz, co-author of Trump's book The Art of the Deal, however, bets it will.

"Trump has severe attention problems and simply cannot take in complex information — he will be unable to practice for these debates," Schwartz told the Times. "Trump will bring nothing but his bluster to the debates. He'll use sixth-grade language, he will repeat himself many times, he won't complete sentences, and he won't say anything of substance."
